THE INVITATION

WHEN Carol first saw Don, she thought it was love at first sight. There he was, sitting in Math class with that dark curl hanging over his forehead, and the eraser of his pencil in his mouth struggling with the problem on the board. "The only trouble is," Carol thought, "that every other girl in Washington High School feels the same way about him."

Ever since Don Thomas transferred to the school from another part of the city, he had been the most popular guy . . . with the girls. The boys, however, keenly felt the competition and had stayed strictly away from this new fellow that all their "steadies" had been raving about. Now the Junior Prom was only two weeks away, and everybody was waiting breathlessly to see what girl Don would ask.

The bell interrupted Carol's train of thought and as she filed out into the hall, careful to fall into line besides Don, she spied Larry waiting for her right outside the door.

"Hi, Doll," Larry shouted. "I've been trying to catch you all morning. I'll walk you to your next class . . . c'mon."

Carol vainly tried to shake Larry, and as her eyes lost Don down the hall, she looked up at Larry angrily. "Now why did you have to break that up, you big square?"

"Break what up?" Larry asked bewildered. Then he saw the direction Carol's eyes had just taken and the whole picture dawned on him. "Why, he wasn't even talking to you."

"No, but I have a feeling that he was just about to."

"Now listen here, Carol . . ." Larry began.

"Oh, don't tell me I'm going to get that story about my being your steady girl and all that again."

"You sure are, you mixed-up kid, and just remember it when you want to flirt with strange boys."

"You are narrow-minded, honestly," she retorted indignantly. "Do you call just talking to someone . . . flirting?"

"The way you talk to him, I'd call flirting. And don't think every member of the Junior Clubhouse doesn't know that all our steadies are making fools of themselves over this, this . . ."

"This very nice boy," Carol continued smugly.

"Well, it may interest you to know," Larry said loftily, "that the reason I met you after class was to ask you to come to the Junior Prom with me . . . but if that's the way you feel, you can just forget it!" And he walked away, leaving Carol standing there very much confused.

As she walked into her English class and took her seat, her mind was a whirl. "If I don't apologize to Larry, he won't ask me to the Prom. And since there's very little chance of Don asking me to the Prom, I will be right up there on the shelf when all of the other kids are having a ball."

Her mind was almost made up to seek Larry out right after class and apologize, when June leaned over and tapped her on the shoulder. "Lucky one," June whispered.

"Why am I so lucky?" Carol asked.

Because I heard that Don wants to talk to Larry very badly. He asked where he could get hold of him as soon as possible. What else could he want to talk about except to tell your steady that he was going to ask you to the Prom?"

"Are you sure?" Carol asked quickly.

"Would I lie to you?" June said.

"N-no, I guess not," Carol said thoughtfully. "Well, that certainly changes my plans. Now all I have to do is sit tight until Don finishes telling Larry just where he stands, and wait for him to ask me to the Prom." And Carol sighed happily.

On her way home from school that night, Carol caught a glimpse of Don and Larry walking home together on the other side of the street, and she was surprised to see that they seemed to be getting along very well. "Larry is taking the news much better than I expected," Carol observed. "I guess it's because Don is telling him about 'us' so tactfully."

Math class the next morning couldn't come around fast enough for Carol. She was there bright and early waiting for Don to come over to her and ask her the big question. She waited, and as the hands on the clock drew closer and closer to nine o'clock, Don still hadn't come in. She spotted him finally coming in the door just ahead of the teacher and he barely had time to slide into his seat before the bell rang to start the class. She caught him once or twice during the class turning in her direction and giving her a shy smile. Her heart jumped and she rehearsed her answer to his invitation to the Prom.

"I won't seem too anxious," she thought. "When the bell rings, I'll be very busy getting all my books together and be very surprised to look up and see him standing there beside me." Sure enough, true to her resolution, when the class ended, Carol didn't even look in Don's direction. She picked up her books very slowly and looked up slowly with a half smile of surprise already forming on her lips. She was surprised all right, but not the way she expected. When she looked up, Don was not anywhere in sight, and she was completely alone in the room. "He's waiting for me outside, of course," she decided, and hastily picked up her books and almost ran out of the door. When she finally stood in the corridor, Don was still nowhere in sight, and she had to look hard to see him turn the corner at the far end of the hall.

"What gives?" she thought hard. "Maybe he was too shy, or too embarrassed, or in a hurry to make his next class." Any one of the arguments could have been true, but Carol knew in her heart there must be another reason, and she just couldn't figure it out. "I'll just have to wait," she thought. And wait she did.

During the next few days, matters didn't clear up at all. Don was still very nice to her. He even exchanged a few words of greeting one morning, and Larry grew more and more impossible to talk to. His attitude was one of complete indifference, and Carol was more confused than ever. "Time," she finally decided, "is definitely growing short. The Prom is Saturday and here it is Friday afternoon already, and so far, I still don't know where I am."

But one thing was comforting. She knew that neither Don nor Larry had asked any other girl to the dance. If Don had, that girl would be so happy she wouldn't be able to keep it to herself for a minute. And if Larry had, someone would be sure to tell Carol immediately . . . as any decent "good friend" would. By Saturday afternoon, Carol had almost given up hope when the telephone rang, and she was so excited she could hardly hold the phone.

"Who is it?" she shouted into the mouthpiece.

"It's Larry, and I'm not in China. I'm right here. And," he continued, "if you're not too terribly busy, I'd like to take you to the Prom tonight."

"Oh, Larry, yes, thank you, I'd be glad to . . . I mean, that is . . ."

"O. K., Doll. I'll pick you up at 8:00."

Larry's father's car pulled in front of Carol's house at exactly eight and Larry leaped out to meet Carol at the front door. His smile was still very mysterious as he escorted her back to the car. As she settled into the front seat, she was amazed to hear a familiar voice from the back say, "Hello, Carol."

She turned quickly, only to be met by the smiling gaze of . . .

"DON!"

Her glance turned confusedly to Larry. He laughed merrily and explained, "You don't mind if we double-date tonight, do you, Carol?"

"But . . . who?"

"Who's he taking?" Larry finished her unasked question. "Tell her, Don."

"I'm taking my girl from Lincoln High, my old school," Don explained casually. "We're sort of engaged . . . at least we're going to be after we finish school and I get a job."

"But, what . . ." Carol was at a loss for words.

"Larry's been swell about arranging for this double-date," Don continued gratefully. "We didn't know how we'd get to the dance without a car. I guess I was kind of shy about asking at first, but . . . well, Larry, thanks a million for everything."

Carol looked at Larry who was still sitting behind the wheel smiling at her. Finally she realized what a swell guy Larry really had been, and she said, "Thanks a million, Larry. And something tells me that we're all going to have a wonderful time together."
